I have been using Python for a while, but it has been quite some time since I have used it as a language for actual programming. My question is - Why does print("Hello World") execute when I try to run this code? try: print("Hello World") except: print("Exception occurred") EDIT - The try-except block executes fine, the problem is that it executes the exception part. EDIT 2 - The problem is not solved as I don't understand why the exception part is being executed. A: Since there is an empty except block, Python doesn't throw an exception. Instead it prints "Exception occurred" and then prints "Hello World". The first round of E-Gold withdrawals have resulted in a major hit to the value of the company, according to analysts. E-Gold was sold to a consortium of investors for $1.1 billion, but those investors have since withdrawn from the company, and the value of E-Gold's stock has dropped as a result. That has left E-Gold with a number of negative factors – negative market prices, the fact that the US government is no longer buying the company's currency, and a reputation as a security that has made for poor business prospects. Meanwhile, the private equity firm that owns E-Gold has been hit with losses of up to $23.4 million on its investment in the company. E-Gold: What is it? E-Gold was once one of the largest electronic currencies in the world. E-Gold was designed to allow users to make online payments to each other using E-Gold, without having to use credit cards or checks. In addition to giving 82157476af
